5.6: Brief Descriptions of the selected cemeteries in the Somme Battlefield area

The choice of cemeteries has been made so as to cover all the main cemeteries containing DLI graves and to ensure all battalions are well and fairly represented. It was also thought of interest to include all three types of cemeteries as described by Middlebrook (Comrades, Communal and Concentration). The final list of 23 Somme area cemeteries out of 56 covers over 83% of identified graves in the area. The following lists give the soldiers' battalion number, date of death and grave space number.

Adanac Military Cemetery, Miraumont-Pys - 36

In the fields north of Courcelette are two major cemeteries on the Canadian battlefield - Regina Trench Cemetery and Adanac Cemetery. (Adanac is Canada spelt backwards.) They are of similar character, both being largely concentration cemeteries from the local battlefields, both being "Canadian" in that the visitors books are bilingual and Maple Leaf plaques are on the gateways. Both are in completely open ground, off the normal "tourist route" and deserve more visits. Adanac Military Cemetery is the larger. This is entirely a concentration cemetery. The concentration burials, particularly in the rear plots of the cemetery, appear to have been drawn from a wide area, with many bodies from United Kingdom units being brought in from the triangle abounded by Le Sars, Martinpuich and Flers, which is three miles away across the Bapaume road and where there are no cemeteries.

All the DLI soldiers buried here were killed in action.

A.I.F. Burial Ground, Grass Lane, Flers- 32

The only military cemetery in the area (Flers and Gueudecourt) is A.I.F. Burial Ground, which was started by Australian troops in November 1916. (A.I.F. were the initials of the Australian Imperial Force.) The original cemetery was no more than the first two rows of Plot 1, just to the left of the entrance, and contained only thirty-two graves. A large post-war concentration then took place, but in two distinct stages. Most of plots 1 to 6 were made, including the French graves in Plot 6, and the architect designed the cemetery layout of pathways and walls on the assumption that there would be no further burials. But then the decision was made to make a further expansion. This was probably in 1927 when Thiepval was chosen for the Memorial to the Missing and the clearance of cemeteries there took place. Approximately 1500 further bodies were transferred to this cemetery and buried in ten plots numbered 7 to 16 which were made along what would have been the side pathways of the original cemetery, in the far comers and in an extra section on the right-hand side. This operation nearly doubled the size of the cemetery, altering its original shape and character and losing the spaciousness of the original plan. A large proportion of these later graves are "unknowns", but those that are identified, show dates and units involved in actions in the Thiepval area in 1916 and 1918, including many men of 36th Ulster Division from 1 July 1916.

The cemetery, with Warlencourt British Cemetery, is the fifth largest British cemetery on the 1916 battlefield; but it is hardly known to visitors, being situated up a track in a near-forgotten comer of the battlefield. The number of "unknowns" is nearly two thirds of the total. The three men of the 22nd Battalion (buried next to each other) may well have been amongst the first to have been buried here.

All the DLI men buried here were killed in action.

Bazentin-le-Petit Communal Cemetery Extension- 7

Bazentin-le-Petit Military Cemetery- 11

The Communal Cemetery, a pretty soldiers' cemetery, was started soon after the capture of Bazentin. Its main feature is the number of graves of the 1st Northampton's who were fighting between Bazentin and High Wood.

The Military cemetery, up a pathway in the main village, is more orderly. There were a few early burials, but the main use was from October 1916 until the following spring when a dressing station operated here. Most of the graves are identified and are in neat rows. The gaps in the rows are the result of German graves being removed after the war.

Becourt Military Cemetery, Becordel-Becourt- 18

Just east of Albert are three lovely comrades' cemeteries, only one of which was added to after the war and that in such a way that the original character of the cemetery was not affected. All three were in the immediate rear of the La Boisselle-Fricourt sector of trenches. Becourt Military Cemetery is in a pretty wood setting in a valley on the quietest of country lanes. The main burials ended in April 1917. But, as so often happened in this area, there were more casualties in 1918 and the 18th (Eastern) Division buried over eighty of their men in a separate little plot at the side of the main cemetery.

Bernafay Wood British Cemetery- 12

The only cemetery in the vicinity (Trones Wood) is Bernafay Wood British Cemetery. It lies on the reverse slope of Montauban Ridge, so that the rows of graves have a pleasing terraced aspect. The continuous rows which are situated away from the road constitute the original cemetery; the remaining graves are post-war concentration of which more than half are unknowns. The original graves are mostly identified, mostly being burials at a Dressing Station which was established here in the later stages of the 1916 battle and in the following winter.

Contalmaison Chateau Cemetery - 8

Contalmaison once had a chateau which housed the German H.Q. before the fall of the village and its cellars were later used by the British as a dressing station. Contalmaison Chateau Cemetery was started in the chateau grounds and was used all through the summer of 1916 and again, briefly, in August 1918. Further graves were added after the war but the cemetery retains its battlefield character, its long use in 1916 being reflected in the great variety of regimental badges on the headstones.

All the DLI soldiers buried here died of wounds.

Delville Wood Cemetery -13

On the other side of the road (from the South African National Memorial) is Delville Wood Cemetery, the third largest cemetery on the Somme. This is entirely a post-war concentration cemetery with no original burials. Sixty five per cent of the graves are "unknowns", but the register entries of the remainder show that nearly all are from late July and from August and September of 1916 and the cemetery represents the many units of the British Army which fought in this area.

Dernancourt Communal Cemetery Extension - 70

Dernancourt was another important rear-area village during 1916, because the pre-war main railway line reached as far as the village and narrow-gauge lines ran from there to the battlefield. The village became the location for medical units which could evacuate their casualties quickly by train. Dernancourt Communal cemetery and Extension is the impressive reminder of how many unfortunate men did not survive to make the train journey. A long narrow plot along the side wall of the civilian cemetery was used for the first burials from September 1915 onwards, and for a few 1918 graves. The large extension was heavily used in the 1916 battle and again during the German, March 1918, offensive until the German advance came right up to Dernancourt which became part of No Man's Land. Further graves were made from the surrounding area after the end of the war, but that addition, Plots 8 and 10, at the right of the upper level, fits in well with the original cemetery.

All the DLI soldiers buried here died from wounds.

Dive Copse British Cemetery - 7

A Main Dressing Station, commanded by an officer called Dive, was located nearby. The 1916 casualties were buried in the long rows of Plots 1 and 2 in the centre and right of the cemetery. I could not help but think of the suffering which took place at the Dressing Station (which was located behind the Cross of Sacrifice) and led to so many men dying before they could reach the surgical facilities and proper nursing of a Casualty Clearing Station. The first three rows of Plot 3 were made after the August 1918 fighting and the remainder of that plot was concentrated after the war.

All the DLI soldiers buried here died of wounds.

Euston Road Cemetery, Colincamps - 12

Euston Road Cemetery is on the lane along which so many men marched up to the trenches from Colincamps. It was a comrades cemetery, but the burials did not start when the British troops came here in 1915 but after the 1 July 1916 attack, when 139 men, nearly all of the 31st Division, were buried, men who were shelled in the British trenches, who died of wounds before being evacuated to the rear, or whose bodies were recovered at night from the British side of No Man's Land. Their burials were well back from the road in the continuous rows of Plot 1 which formed the original cemetery. The first two rows and part of the fourth are all 1 July graves, some of which have nice personal inscriptions including all the 'Durhams' graves.

At the end of the war these graves were linked to the road by a large concentration of graves from the surrounding area. Just inside is a row of memorial headstones of men believed to be buried in the cemetery.

All the DLI soldiers buried here, with the exception of Private Bennett, were killed in action.

Further up the track (from Mametz village to Bazentin) is Flatiron Copse Cemetery, so named from a small piece of woodland on the opposite side of the track. It is most attractively located, on a slope, with Mametz Wood behind. The headstones are not of the normal type of Portland stone but appear to be of a soft type of granite. The line of the northern boundary wall was almost exactly the line on which the left battalions of the 7th Division - the 8th Devons and 2nd Border - deployed for their successful dawn attack against Bazentin on 14 July.

A Dressing Station was established here soon after that date and made the graves in the continuous rows which now form Plot 1 (including 8 Durham graves). The remainder of the cemetery is post-war concentrations from the surrounding battlefields.

Gordon Dump Cemetery, La Boisselle - 31

Half a mile across the fields (from La Boisselle), in what was once the German rear, is Gordon Dump cemetery. Many of the graves are unidentified by name though often they are identified by regiment. A lane once ran from La Boisselle to Contalmaison, passing the south-eastern side of the cemetery. This is mostly a concentration cemetery and it was laid out after the war with a frontage on that lane with its entrance in the middle of the wall by the lane. Unfortunately the lane fell into disuse and disappeared so that a new entrance to the cemetery had to be made at the other end of the cemetery. This results in a long walk from the nearest road and the view on entering the cemetery is now completely different from that intended by the architect. The first graves here were made on the battlefield in July 1916; they are in the two continuous rows just inside the present gateway (and include all the Durham graves). The post-war concentration process was a local one and reflects the local fighting.

All the DLI soldiers buried here were killed in action.

Grove Town Cemetery, Meaulte - 34

Five roads or tracks fanned out northwards from Bray to cross a wide, almost featureless plateau to reach the "old front line" trench sectors between Fricourt and Maricourt. Grove Town Cemetery is alongside one of those tracks. It was made after September 1916 when a railway was constructed to this point allowing Casualty Clearing Stations to be provided closer to the fighting area. The first men to be buried died following the battle of 15

All the DLI soldiers buried here died of wounds.

Guards Cemetery, Lesboeufs - 33

The Guards cemetery was started when forty men, most or all from the 3rd Grenadiers killed on 25 September, were buried at the side of the road in what is now Plot 1, to the left of the entrance. The remainder of the cemetery was a post-war concentration from the surrounding area. It is one of the most beautiful of the concentration cemeteries. It is situated on a high bank above a sunken road and the cemetery architect designed a particularly attractive entrance to the bank.

All the DLI soldiers buried here were killed in action.

Heilly Station Cemetery - 55

Heilly Station Cemetery served a group of three CCSs (Casualty Clearing Station), which bore the brunt of the congestion (from early casualties). Ambulances from the front reached that place first; ambulances from the rear reached it last. The cemetery bears witness to what happened. The rows of Plot 1 (4 Durham graves) and part of Plot 2, at the left rear of the cemetery, show how men died in such numbers that burial parties had to bury men on top of each other; most of the headstones show three names. Approximately 260 men died in the first week of July, an appalling mortality rate. Most of these casualties came from the centre and south of the battlefield, from the La Boisselle, Fricourt, Mametz and Montauban areas. The congestion was eventually cleared, but the manner in which the 1916 battle developed on the southern wing of the original attack front resulted in the CCSs at Heilly being heavily used all through the battle and most are of men who died of wounds here in 1916.

All the DLI soldiers buried here, died from wounds, with the exception of Private Martin, who died from disease.

This cemetery is a typical 1916 Casualty Clearing Station cemetery. It started with seventy men who died of wounds received on 1 July, now buried in Plot 1, Row A, mostly 18th and 30th Division casualties from the Mametz and Montauban areas.

All the DLI soldiers buried here, died from wounds.

Serre Road Cemetery No.1 - 12

Serre Road Cemetery No.2 - 9

No.1 Cemetery is a good example of a battlefield cemetery expanded by a post-war concentration of burials to link up with the road. A visit should start at the back of the cemetery, on the left. Rows G to A of Plot 1 should be then identified. These seven rows were the original cemetery made by V Corps in May 1917. The graves were mainly of men who died on 1 July 1916 near the junction of the 4th and 31st Divisions. There are many

West Yorks, and Durhams from the 31st Division (in fact all the Durham graves are of 18th Battalion men who were killed on 1 July).

More than 2000 graves were added to the cemetery after the war.

No.2 Another cemetery on the Serre Road and the largest cemetery on the Somme, a magnificent sight with an open front and forty-one plots of graves rising up the slope of the Redan Ridge. This is mainly a concentration cemetery, one so large that the original graves of 1 July and 13 November 1916, around which it was built, can hardly be seen from the road; they are in rows set at an angle just behind the Stone of Remembrance. The 489 graves there were the original Serre Road No. 2 made by V Corps in 1917 from bodies found in the immediate area. There are now over 7000 graves, many of them unidentified. It is best regarded as a cemetery representing the whole of the 1916 Battle of the Somme because the men buried there came from nearly every part of the battlefield.

All the DLI soldiers buried here were killed in action.

Warlencourt British Cemetery - 122

This is an impressive and important cemetery containing the dead of the units which attacked the Butte and also those which fought in that large area of battlefield all the way back to Martinpuich, High Wood and Flers which has no other cemeteries. It is an excellent example of a concentration cemetery, carefully and attractively laid out, and with its impressive entrance on a main road for easy access by visitors. This cemetery (with the A.I.F. Burial Ground) is the fifth largest British cemetery on the Somme. It was made very soon after the war, in late 1919, but even then more than half of the bodies could not be identified. There are a lot of late 1916 graves, Durhams, Northumberlands, Londons, South Africans and New Zealanders who fought here and to the east of here in October.

All the DLI soldiers buried here, with the exception of Private Watson who died from wounds, were killed in action.
